

AGATHA'S LOVER WAS NOT PROMPT.

He Promised a Silk Gown, and Called With-out It.

SO SHE DISMISSED HIM.

When He Returned with Three Gowns She Had Already Replaced Him.

HE IS SOBSKI, THE POET.

Public Opinion in the Shops of Chryste Street Censures Him as a Man Who Keeps Not His Word.

By Henri Fene du Bois.

If you ask in the shops of Chryste street why Agatha Guldstein broke her engagement to be married to Joseph Sobieski the people reply, shrugging their shoulders, "He was a jollier, he was a liar, he was no good."

He is a poet; it is the fate of such to be misunderstood. At the house of Agatha, whose fingers are black from needle pricks, Sobieski was to be found often than in his own room, and the rare dollars which the Muse accorded to him melted into bouquets and candles for her.

With her enormous brown eyes, her little, saucy nose, her mouth, as red as a flower, her long and flexible neck, her head was one of the most ravishing that he could imagine.

Supple and thin, she was charming to him, especially in close fitting gown, starched collar and Faust boots. Agatha would have signed her little hands. Withal, she is as stupid as a goose. She sang the ballads of the sidewalk, which she had the art to reduce to a minute time.

She placed her pride as an honest girl in being engaged to only one man at a time, but, without scruples, she talked to him of those who had preceded him, studding her phrases with roses of Pauls, Bagnones, Alexanders, Fredericks and Brunsts, whom she said were monsters, but nevertheless gentle. From morning until night she drew her needle with a regularity that exasperated Sobieski.

When his kisses interrupted her, she complained, with bitterness, that he had made her lose a day's work, the value of which was 30 cents. Imagine what he thought of her regrets at the sacrifice of one or two cents for an expression of love—she who had the pretension soon to earn enough gold to place Agatha in a palace.

What she said annoyed him, but his pen running over the paper enraged her. She asked him once what he was writing, and he replied, naturally, "Verses."

She exclaimed, "Oh, well, then, sing them!" Sobieski said imprudently, "They are not verses to be sung." She looked at him with cold indignation, as if he had pretended that tigers swim and crocodiles fly.

The idea of verses not made to be sung represented absolutely nothing to her, and if you place yourself in Orpheus's point of view—which is the true one—you must admit that she was right.

"Well, what are you doing, of what use is it?" she asked. He replied, "Oh, to buy you a silk dress."

At these amazing words Agatha opened immense eyes and assumed an expression of surprise, doubt and desire. But it passed quickly. She could not believe in anything so extravagant for a silk dress, with a long looking glass and artificial flowers under a globe, one of her three great dreams.

"A silk dress," she said with irony. "When?"

He replied gaily, "In a fortnight."

He did not know with what spirit of contempt his Chryste street girl, full of order and serious, would count minutes.

And hours. A fortnight after, having no money, he had not eaten and it was fasting and foolish that he called on his infatuated. He had glanced furtively at the comic papers, and as none of his work was in them he was stupefied at once by humiliation and pain in his stomach.

He was thinking of Agatha's beautiful eyes, of her pomegranate lips and of the fact that he would soon be consoled by seeing her smile. But he found her cold, cruel, distant. She asked for her silk dress, as a bank collector asks for the sum of a note. When she replied sadly that he hadn't it, she became frightfully pale and he read ferocious hatred in her pupils.

"You haven't it," she said, opening the door, "then go, and don't come back till you get it."

He was very hungry. Still he felt two tears running down his cheeks, for he adored this girl with a bird's brain, who sang ballads of the sidewalk, in a voice false enough to make the stones shudder. But he was diverted by the sight of old Simon Raab, the tailor, waving his hands.

"I owe you fifty dollars," said Raab, "here it is." For Sobieski had loaned money to Raab while he was on strike. Sobieski is twenty and he was hungry. He could smoke cigars, buy furniture, dine at the Waldorf. "What do you think, I did? Do you think I dined?" he asked yesterday.

"No, I think you bought the gown. In cases like this one always buys the gown. I bought three gowns, one pink, one green, one sulphur, and I came to Agatha's door, faltering under their weight."

The housekeeper was at the threshold. "Miss Guldstein does not live here," she said. "Her 'steady' has taken her to the Park in a hansom."

Dillingham-Gillmore Wedding.
The wedding of Lieutenant Albert C. Dillingham, U. S. N., Chief of the Labor Bureau at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and Miss Grace Gillmore, daughter of Daniel W. Gillmore, of Creston, Iowa, will be performed at the home of Captain A. C. Kelton, U. S. M. C., brother-in-law of the bridegroom, at Boston, Mass., at noon on Tuesday, June 22. Rev. Dr. Burrows, of Boston, will officiate. A wedding breakfast will be served at Captain Kelton's home after the ceremonies, and the bride and party will leave for a short trip. Only the immediate families of the bride and groom will be present at the ceremony. Miss Kelton will be the maid of honor, while Assistant Naval Constructor Horatio G. Gillmore will be best man. After the inspiration of Lieutenant Dillingham's presence leave they will take up their residence in New York.

THE BIG STORE SIEGEL-COOPER CO. MEET ME AT THE MOUNTAIN SIXTH AVE. 18th & 19th STS.

Prices Talk

Loudly These Days at "The Big Store."

Sensational selling has become a daily event. Next Monday will be a favorable day for bargain getting if you purchase here. For a week past many of the buyers have been preparing a special sale to begin tomorrow when the store opens at 8 o'clock. It is needless to say that the shrewd buyers of New York will be here in force.

As a matter of interest to our patrons we will repeat our announcement of last Friday, that "The Big Store" has purchased the entire stock of Collins, formerly known as J. N. Collins & Co. We have secured at our own price the entire stock of merchandise contained in their four-story building on Fourteenth street, with the exception of the millinery and ribbons, which were not the property of Collins & Co. but belonged to another party who rented these departments in the Collins store. Our announcement of the date of the sale of these goods will appear in the daily papers.
